DWAYNE FIELDS BIO Polar Expeditionist

Born in Jamaica, Dwayne Fields grew up in the U.K. from the age of 6. He has been the victim of both knife and gun crime, and as a result of his experiences with gangs, he decided to change his life.

He became an adventurer and explorer, completed a combined honors degree in Psychology, International Development and Business Management and spent three years as an electrical and mechanical engineer for London Underground before following his passion and raising funds to reach the magnetic North Pole.

Fields was the first Black Briton to achieve this feat, and later that year, he was also named Choice FM's Role Model of the Year. On his return, he was invited to Buckingham Palace for a reception to mark the centenary of Robert Falcon Scott's expedition to the South Pole in the presence of HRH Queen Elizabeth II.

Since then, he has dedicated his life to helping urban youth by focusing on outdoor activities, such as walking and climbing. As a result, Fields has been awarded the Freedom of the City of London by its Lord Mayor. He is a dedicated ambassador for the Scout Association, the National Trust and the Woodland Trust.

At the end of 2019, Fields, with his expedition partner, went on a mission to engage young people to seek epic adventures and highlight environmental issues close to home while turning the spotlight on wildlife conservation efforts. They embarked on the Seabirds to South adventure, an expedition from the northernmost to the southernmost points of mainland Britain. Their next project is to take a group of underprivileged young people to Antarctica in 2022 on a specially chartered expedition ship through their #WeTwo Foundation.

Fields is a force to be reckoned with. He is currently planning his next adventures and working on several broadcast projects.
